with a fair demand. While the United States Government holds and seeks to accumulate large balances in the Tresaury, and would thus maintain public credit by intolerable taxation, Great Britain reduces taxation to the lowest possible rate consistent with the possibility of payment of all liabilities. When the British Minister of Finance finds a small surplus in the Tresaury of seventeen millions of dollars not pounds), he recommends a pro rata reduction of taxation. Boutwell, on the contrary, would still have an excess of gold, or give it to the bondholders. He persistently opposes any diminution of popular burdens. Each successive reduction of taxation increases production and the ability of the people to pay. The value of canals, not only as a pkgs sundries; C. J. Hargan, 10 do. the Mississippi is filled with interminable disquisitions on the value of railway means of draining the richest lands in the world, but as means of transportation, seems utterly forgotton. In 1868, during seven months of navigation, when there were no freezes, the Eric Canal transorted 700,000 more tone of freight than the Eric and New York Central roads both combined, with all their capital, advertising and reduced rates. The time may come when the scheme of connecting branches of the Mississippi with one another by egnals, and thus regulating floods in the great river, may be populartred and perfected. Levess we must have, but there is a limit to their utility, and canals will solve the problem of reclaiming the low lands of the Mississippl.
